A newly qualified lawyer made news recently when he began a landmark legal battle to force banks to repay millions of pounds in bank charges to their customers. Tom Brennan, a lecturer's son from London, was furious when his bank charged him a total of £2500 over several years. The charges were for exceeding his overdraft limit. At that time Tom was struggling to meet day-to-day expenses during his training as a barrister. He argued that the bank charges, which were up to £38 every time he exceeded his overdraft limit, were unlawful. This is because, in reality, it costs a bank only £2.50 every time a customer exceeds his or her overdraft limit.

Mr Brennan said that after he started the case the bank refunded the charges, putting them into his account "without my permission, without any explanation and against my express wishes" and then closed his account. But he also claimed that the bank failed to pay £37 due to him in interest and therefore should not be allowed to say that it made a full refund. He refused an offer of a £4000 out-of-court settlement and said that he would decline all offers.

Example

(* ) Tom Brennan is a barrister.

- (1) The bank owes Tom Brennan millions of pounds.

- (B) Hmm, I'm not sure if I'd like to do that sort of law. How many years experience do you want the lawyer to have?
- (C) I have to interview five lawyers who want to join this firm. There were lots of applicants, but after I read their CVs, I shortlisted these five people.
- (D) Not bad thanks. I've got a busy day ahead of me though.
- (E) Insolvency. Because of the recent interest rate rises there are a lot of personal and company insolvencies and we need another lawyer.
- (F) Well, good luck with the interviewing. I hope you find the right person. See you later.
- (G) Oh, just newly qualified, or up to one year PQE. There are already enough senior lawyers in that department.
- (H) Really? What are you doing?

PERSONAL BANKRUPTCY

Someone who owes money to another person is known as a (*) . . . . . Many people have debts and most people manage to pay back those debts over the agreed period of time. But recently, especially in Europe, Australia and the USA, rising interest (1) . . . . . mean that more and more people are finding that they cannot pay back their debts. So what can they do? One possible (2) . . . . . for these people is bankruptcy.

When a person becomes bankrupt he or she has to make a list of everything he or she owns. These things are called (3) . . . . . The bankrupt person also makes a list of everything he or she owes. These things are called liabilities. A trustee is then appointed, who takes control of all of the bankrupt's property. The trustee sells the property and uses the money from the sale, known as the (4) . . . . . of sale, to pay the people who are owed money. These people are formally known as the bankrupt person's (5) . . . . .

During bankruptcy, there are many (6) . . . . . on a bankrupt person, who is usually described as a 'bankrupt', which will limit his or her freedom. For example, a bankrupt will not be able to get credit during the bankruptcy. Even when the bankruptcy is discharged, (7) . . . . . will be reluctant to offer credit to potential borrowers who they know to have a bad credit history. A bankrupt may not be allowed to work in certain occupations, including being a lawyer, during the term of the bankruptcy. They are also not allowed to be a (8) . . . . . of a company. In many jurisdictions, a bankrupt is not allowed to travel overseas during the bankruptcy without the (9) . . . . . of the trustee.

So why do people choose to become bankrupt? Well, bankruptcy is a way of allowing the debtor to make a fresh start. However, each individual considering bankruptcy will need to think about the advantages and (10) . . . . . of this route.

E-MAIL TRACKING – A BREACH OF HUMAN RIGHTS

A college worker in Wales successfully sued her employer for breaching the European Convention on Human Rights when she discovered that her employer was monitoring how much she used the internet at work. Her employer was also watching or 'tracking' all the e-mails she sent at work.

Lynette Copland, who worked as an assistant to the principal of a college in West Wales, discovered that her employer was tracking the places she went to on the college campus, the people she e-mailed and the websites she visited. She was the only employee who was monitored in this way and this upset Ms Copland. She told the court, "I have no objection to an employer monitoring me when I know about it. Also, if an employer decides to monitor all of its employees, that is not a problem. But to select just one person for monitoring is surely an injustice."

Ms Copland told the court she did not have a good working relationship with the college's deputy principal, Mr Wrentmore, the man who started the campaign that lasted for 18 months. Ms Copland believes Mr Wrentmore wanted to find something negative about her. The European Court of Human Rights was told that the dates and times of her telephone calls and the numbers she rang were monitored, along with the dates and duration of her visits to websites and the details of her e-mail correspondence. The college said that the reason for this was to see whether Ms Copland was using college facilities too much for her own personal use.

The court ruled that in collecting and storing Ms Copland's personal information without her knowledge, the college had interfered with her "right to a private life". The court also held that the actions of the college were in breach of Ms Copland's right to privacy and ordered it to pay Ms Copland compensation of 9000 Euros.

The Human Rights organisation that acted for Ms Copland, said it had brought the case in Strasbourg because, at that time, there was no statutory right to privacy under British law, and the Data Protection Act, in the form that it existed then, did not cover the college's actions.

A leading employment law specialist said that this case "reinforces the notion that there are restrictions on an employer's right to monitor their employees internet usage and they can't assume they have carte blanche to behave the way they like".

Ms Copland, 57, is still employed by the college and said she was very satisfied with the judgment. Mr Wrentmore has since died.
